

Human Hubris Virus, Back on Course?

By Eydie McDaniel

Current information makes a clear demonstration. During this pandemic:

Humans stopped belching most travel fumes into our precious air. The change worked great. For the first time in decades, clear air surrounds Los Angeles. Photos of cities world wide show crisp edges of buildings, the graceful curves of highways, and even blue sky. On the waters reflections of beauty now dance. Fish can actually be seen by looking into the water of the Venetian canals.

The pandemic achieved significant progress in slowing human damage. So obviously, humans can help our planet sustain our lives. Yet immaturity fights on to bring back our full damaging level. Why is it a great life to restore lung clogging pollution, belching harmful gases, and wasting the benefits of Earth? Harming the earth guarantees harming our lives. No amount of immature denial or protest will ever change the fact that the planet has the real power.

Like a good parent, mother nature extends a strong stiff arm and puts it's pandemic palm firmly on the forehead of the whole human world. The human species with such great brains can choose to learn.

Yet, instead of getting the message from the extended arm of a deadly virus, humanity flails its fists in the air like a foolish child in a temper tantrum. Of course, economic flow matters. The folly of ignoring the approaching pandemic for fear of financial reputation could not be more plain to see. Survival can only come through devout allegiance to our planet.

THANK YOU PLANET EARTH, for forcing us to pause from harming our very source of life.
