

Chasing Dirt
by Nancy Martz

Although you chase dirt down the drains and out the door, it always returns; your efforts are futile. You can never just wash up and be done with it. Every morning it's back in your mouth, on your face, in your ears, under your nails, on your hair, under your arms, between your toes, in your nose, everywhere you scrubbed and brushed and gargled and shampooed and q-tipped and pumiced yesterday. Dirt is back and must be vanquished again and again and again, forever.

How many times have you wiped the sleep out of your eyes, blew a hunk out of your nose, hacked up a fistula, cut the cheese, or, My Friends, dusted collectibles, picture frames, TV and computer screens, lamp shades, end tables, book shelves, book covers, floor boards, or swept the floor, wiped the counters, scoured the pots, sponged the dishes, vacuumed the rugs, laundered the clothes, scraped your boots and sanitized the toilet during your lifetime? Even when you wash your company china after Thanksgiving, Christmas, and New Years and put it away in a closed hutch, it somehow collects muck and must be cleansed again before a next time use.
